MO., THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1909 Osteopathic Catechism WHAT THERE IS NEW IN OSTEOPA.

Q. What theory, essentially new to medical science, has osteopathy established to be the common

A. Mechanical disorder within the organism. Mal-adjustment of the organis a. Mal-adjustment of parts, particularly of the bony framework of the body upon which all the soft structures are sup- 2 ported, any slight deviation of which from its correct position S and alignment may cause pressure, | strains, congestion, pains and interruption of work in the local, softer parts-the nerves and blood channels-that thereby become blockaded. Advanced thinkers in medicine have now gotten so far as to affirm that "structural defect" is first necessary to produce functional aberrations; but abnormalities in relationship, defective adjustment and faulty proportions, in a word, "bad" mechanics as the initial point of this faulty structure has not somehow appealed to

A. The ordinary wear-and-tear of life; the innumerable incidents and accidents to which everybody hourly is liable. These may be hourly is liable. These may be upon the body from without.

(3) Contractions of muscles. posure, over-exertion, etc. These mechanical disturbances, osteopaare first in importance in upsetor later, ills functional or structural, acute or chronic, "medical" or "surgical." Osteopathy has thus added a new class of disturbances to the science of pathology, the only first cause of disease? energy and producing disease, we believe, than heredity acts independently.

medicine recognized such mechanical disorders as causing disease? A: Absolutely no. It seems to have been entirely forgotten by other physicians that higher life exists and its nutrition proceeds upon the basis of mechanics as well as chemistry. Physicians surgeons to their operations, do not by their work admit, as a class, this common-sense proposition. How handicapped they must be in consequence in attempting to diagnose and remedy bodily defects clearly due to these hidden mechanical causes!

A. By no means. Hardly less important are the abuses of function from overwork in local parts of the body, such as result, for instance, from over-eating or overdrinking. An organ may break down from overwork when it has an average nerve and blood supply. Heredity adds an important predisposition determining the quality and quantity of nervous their aberrations. However artificially induced mechanical "lesions" co-operate with functional overwork and hereditary weakness much oftener in
